14. Haute Baso is a Rwandan success story. The business is one of the youngest companies chosen to exhibit its handmade items at the annual meeting of the African Development Bank.

The two young founders, Linda Mukangoga and Candy Basominger, believe that it is Rwanda's unique designs that are the strength of their company. Haute Baso works with locally trained artisans at cooperatives. Here they produce handmade items using raw materials sourced from within Africa.

Design businesses in Rwanda face many different problems. Two such problems are finding reliable tailors and sourcing raw materials. When the founders met to discuss solutions they realised that 'two heads are better than one'. The result was a successful partnership that allows both women to realize their dreams.

- a. Describe how the two entrepreneurs addressed challenges faced by the business.
- b. What are the benefits of starting Haute Baso for the two entrepreneurs?
- c. Haute Baso employs many female artisans. Research has shown that women spend most of their income on their children's education, health and nutrition. Explain how employing women can make a long-term positive change to Rwanda.

- d. Haute Baso was featured in the East African Weekly for their participation in the biannual Kigali Pop Up. How do you think that an invitation to exhibit and feature in a magazine affects the status of entrepreneurs in their community?

 27. A thousand grey hills of granite

The discovery of natural granite changed the life of a little village in Nyagatare district in the Eastern Province. Today, East African Granite Industries operates a modern granite-processing factory in the region. This provides work for many local people. The products include granite tops for kitchen tables, tiles for walls and floors, and cobble stones for road production. The granite mined, called ‘a thousand grey hills’, is very hardy. It is polished to make it into a very desirable stone for both the local and the export market. It is sold through the company’s sales department in a showroom in Kigali.
